I didn't see this photo until he appeared on my Timehop 3 years later, Simon's birthday yesterday. Actually, somebody probably showed me in the recovery room, but it was all a huge vent. I remember that when they pulled him out of my stomach in Section C, he was making some noise. He cried a bit, but mostly it just meant robbing everyone and making this little noise. My first thought was that he looked so pissed. My second thought was that it was beautiful, but in an angry, I'm afraid of my baby right now a bit of a way. Disclaimer: We all know that the children of all others come out like every other child in the world. But not your baby, your baby is beautiful even when it has some nonsense about him and looks like an angry hobby. My third thought was to worry if he was okay because of his little noise. Something didn't seem right. That wasn't what I expected. I listened to that noise while they weighed him and asked him a million times if he was okay. Then they brought him here to hold him for the first time. They put my cool baby embarrassingly in my arms, and this is exactly when this photo was taken. I remember grabbed him and made some weird noises to try to calm him down and make him stop sneezing. I look at this photo and I see my eyes closed and my hand on his small, small head and I remember that feeling in my heart. And I swear you made a little sigh of relief. And then I know our family was complete. Strangely, after that, I was afraid to let him fall. I don't know why this was my natural train of thought, but it continued in that direction. I love this photo and I'm glad I just found it. He gave me all the sensations and heart full of which I needed at this moment of uncertainty. No matter what, a mom will always protect herso do not mess with our children or we will immediately remember your name for the restOur life and you don't like it for fifty years, even if we've never met you. Flat panel displays are often referred to as "display addresses" because each pixel in the display can be directly addressed. In the case of an LCD panel, for example, you can command the red sub-pixel in the third column and the fourth row to turn on or off. As a result, the number of pixels the display can produce is fixed. An LCD XGA panel has 1024 for 768 pixels, which is also called its "native resolution". If you try to display an image in another resolution on this panel, it will have to be scaled or down to fill the screen. CRTs are different. They use electron cannons to shoot an electron flow to the front surface coated with phosphorus of the image tube. The image resolution is largely defined by the speed at which the beam is turned on and off, and how many lines are scanned on the screen. (There are also other issues involved, as if the beam point size is sufficiently small and the phosphorus point field sufficiently fine to accurately produce pixels in a clear way.) As a result, a CRT can produce different resolution images that fill the entire display area without the scaling artifacts observed in addressable displays. Photographers are great. I work with some of the best in the world. I also want to be one of them. Okay, not really — I'm too busy. And frankly, the life of a photographer is not all so cool: It is a huge mess of customers, chemicals and contact sheets. So thanks to the goodness for digital technology. I just got my first digital camera - a Digilux Zoom. It is the Leica version of the Fuji MX-2700. Now, Fuji is a great camera, but the Leica model is a Great Camera. And if Leica is the BMW of the camera world, Digilux is his roadster Z8. Leica's tradition lives in the style of the old school of the body in Titanium of Digilux, in its leather handles, and in that timeless Leica red logo. I do not worry about software or cables that are bundled with the camera (the software is annoyingly slow and prone to crashing). Instead, I use a SmartMedia USB card reader (about $70) and drags JPEG directly to my hard drive. Then I mold them on Epson photographic paper using my Epson Stylus Photo 1200 printer. The Digilux Zoom costs $649, and the Epson Stylus Photo 1200 sells for $499.
